

Economic Impact of Homelessness Is Significant; Improvements Needed at State and Local Levels

at a glance

The economic impact of homelessness in Florida is significant, with the state, local, and federal governments spending at least $168 million annually for programs and services to assist the homeless. This total excludes expenses incurred by local entities such as the police, courts, emergency service providers, hospital emergency rooms, and some private charities in dealing with homeless persons, as these costs are not tracked by homeless coalitions, service providers, or government agencies.

Statewide, Florida is doing well in obtaining dedicated federal funding for the homeless. However, some areas of the state have not done well in accessing federal funding.

State agencies assist local homeless efforts by providing technical assistance, direct services, and funding. However, some state agency practices and administrative requirements of mainstream programs could be improved.

Coordination among local homeless service providers is occurring, but could be improved by increased participation of service providers and full implementation of their computerized information systems.

Scope

Chapter 2001-98, Laws of Florida, directed the Office of Program Policy Analysis and Government Accountability (OPPAGA) to examine state efforts to address homelessness. As provided by law, our report addresses the four questions below.

- What is the economic impact of homelessness in Florida?
- To what extent are local continuums of care accessing dedicated and mainstream federal funding for the homeless?
- How can state agency practices be improved to better assist the homeless?
- How can local providers better coordinate services for the homeless?

Background

Homelessness is a chronic problem in Florida.¹ In 2003, Florida's homeless population was estimated to range from 68,785 to 76,675 persons on any particular day.² Homeless populations include various subgroups, such as families, veterans, senior citizens, and youth. People may become homeless for many reasons, including poverty, lack of affordable housing and transportation, unemployment, illness, and divorce. Homeless individuals also frequently suffer from substance abuse and mental illness.

Federal, state, and local governments, faith-based organizations, and private and non-profit entities provide services to assist the homeless in securing housing, employment and health and treatment services. Homeless individuals are typically assisted at the local level through a network of service providers that may include shelters, food and clothing banks, and mental health and substance abuse treatment centers.

Funding to address homelessness in Florida is provided by a variety of sources, including federal, state, and local governments and private donations. See page 3 for further discussion of homelessness funding and Appendix A, page 8, for a list of funding sources.

State Office on Homelessness. At the state level, the Department of Children and Families' Office on Homelessness serves as the central point of contact on homeless issues.³ The office's primary role is to coordinate state agencies and programs that serve the homeless or persons at risk of becoming homeless. The office also administers state-funded grant programs to assist local coalitions that serve the homeless.

The Legislature appropriated the Department of Children and Families $726,655 and three full-time equivalent positions to administer the Office on Homelessness in Fiscal Year 2004-05.⁴

Council on Homelessness. The Council on Homelessness is responsible for developing policies to reduce homelessness in the state and advising the State Office on Homelessness. The council also annually prepares a report to the Governor and Legislature recommending actions that can help reduce homelessness in Florida. The council has 15 members representing state agencies, gubernatorial appointees, statewide organizations, and homeless advocacy groups.

Local Homeless Coalitions. Homeless coalitions plan, coordinate, and monitor the delivery of services to the homeless at the local level. Homeless coalitions consist of local organizations and government agencies that provide services for the homeless. Members include mental health and substance abuse treatment providers, county health departments, entities that provide food and shelter, law enforcement units, regional workforce boards, public housing authorities, school districts, and county and municipal governments. As of November 2004, 29 homeless coalitions representing all 67 counties were operating in Florida.

Homeless coalitions must establish continuum of care plans in order to be eligible to apply for federal homeless grants from the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) and certain state grants administered by the State Office on Homelessness.⁵ The coalitions or a designated lead agency are to use these plans to establish a framework for providing emergency, transitional, and permanent housing as well as supportive services to the homeless and persons at risk of becoming homeless. Sixty-one of Florida's 67 counties are currently covered under a continuum of care system; the remaining six counties are rural counties that have few homeless service providers. (See Appendix B on page 13 for a map of areas covered by continuums of care and their lead agencies.)

Questions and Answers —

Our review of homelessness in Florida considered four questions.

- What is the economic impact of homelessness in Florida?
- To what extent are local continuums of care accessing dedicated and mainstream federal funds for the homeless?
- How can state agency practices be improved to better assist the homeless?
- How can local governments and entities better coordinate services for the homeless?

What is the economic impact of homelessness in Florida?

Homelessness has a significant economic impact on the state, including the costs of providing direct services to homeless persons. As shown in Exhibit 1, we identified $168 million in state, federal, and local funding for programs and services to assist the homeless, such as housing, food preparation and distribution, transportation and mental health counseling.

This figure does not include the expenses incurred by various local entities, such as some private charities as well as the police, the courts, emergency service providers, and hospital emergency rooms that deal with homeless persons. Homeless persons often are arrested for various minor crimes such as vagrancy, and often require emergency health treatment. These expenses cannot be determined because they are not separately tracked by homeless coalitions, service providers, and government agencies; however, they are likely to be significant. This can be illustrated by the case of a homeless individual whose service-related expenses were tracked by the homeless coalition serving the City of Jacksonville. This person was a 35-year-old chronically homeless male diagnosed with bipolar disorder and alcoholism. The local homeless coalition estimated that local entities incurred $43,545 in costs over a seven-month period in dealing with this individual. These costs included amounts resulting from four separate admittances to a crisis stabilization unit for mental illness, three emergency room visits, two admittances to the hospital intensive care unit, 120 total days spent in the county jail, and two stays at a local shelter.

This figure also does not include the societal costs of homeless, which cannot be readily calculated. These costs could include degraded property values in areas frequented by homeless persons, lost economic activity, and disrupted education and family situations of children affected by homelessness.

To what extent is the state accessing dedicated federal homeless funds?

A major source of dedicated funding for homeless programs is the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). HUD annually awards dedicated funds for homeless programs created by the McKinney-Vento Homeless Assistance Act to local continuums of care.⁶

Florida is doing well on a statewide basis in obtaining dedicated homeless funding from HUD. As shown in Exhibit 2, HUD has awarded Florida more than its pro-rata amount of funds in each of the last three fiscal years.

As part of its competitive grant process, HUD initially estimates a “pro-rata need,” which is the dollar expression of relative homeless assistance needs it assigns to each community or groups of communities using U.S. Census Bureau data. HUD may award a community funding that exceeds its pro-rata amount if the community’s continuum of care entity submits a funding application that

- meets HUD’s grant award criteria, such as providing permanent housing for disabled adults;
- clearly identifies a priority need and includes documentation showing how a proposed project would eliminate or substantially decrease the need; and ⁶The federal McKinney-Vento Homeless Assistance Act was passed in 1987. It provides funding to state and local groups through formula or competitive grants to assist communities to develop housing and provide services for the homeless.

- requests renewal funding for projects that were funded in previous years.

Continuums of care may receive less than their pro-rata amount if HUD determines that their funding applications do not adequately address grant award criteria or if the continuum does not seek renewal funding for its projects.

Some Florida continuums have not done well in accessing HUD funding. Between 2001 and 2003, 15 continuums received less than their pro-rata amount as initially determined by HUD. State Office on Homelessness and HUD managers reported that coalitions received less than their pro-rata amount because they failed to apply for funding, submitted applications that contained errors or included activities that were ineligible for funding, or did not have a permanent housing project included in their plans.

Access to mainstream services could be improved. A major concern in serving homeless individuals is ensuring they have access to federal mainstream assistance programs. Mainstream programs are those that provide various forms of financial, health, and social support designed to remedy the disabling conditions and other problems that prevent homeless individuals from becoming healthy and living as self-sufficiently as possible in permanent, stable housing. These programs, such as Temporary Assistance to Needy Families (TANF), Medicaid, and Social Security Income (SSI) are intended to help lower income people and not dedicated to serving the homeless.

The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development requires local continuums of care to report on the extent to which they are systematically assisting homeless persons to access federal mainstream program services as part of their grant applications. As shown in Exhibit 3, most of Florida’s homeless continuums of care reported they were assisting homeless people access several mainstream programs.

However, some continuums could improve their efforts to help homeless individuals access federal programs. For example, 11 of 26 continuums did not report helping homeless persons access services provided through the State Children’s Health Insurance Program (SCHIP), and eight did not report helping them access Workforce Investment Act services.

We contacted representatives of six continuums of care that reported that their member agencies did not routinely help homeless persons identify, apply for, and follow up to receive benefits for two or more mainstream programs. These representatives gave several reasons for not assisting homeless individuals to access mainstream programs, including not being aware of programs such as SCHIP and the Workforce Investment Act and difficulty in working with their regional workforce agency that administers the Workforce Investment Act. However, two representatives indicated that their continuums had incorrectly completed their HUD grant applications and were in fact helping homeless persons access mainstream programs.

One of the objectives in the Council on Homelessness strategic plan is to increase the percentage of homeless individuals assisted by mainstream programs. In September 2004, the Office on Homelessness proposed that representatives of local continuums of care meet with state agency officials who administer mainstream programs to (1) identify barriers that limit the ability of the homeless to access program benefits, and (2) work cooperatively to develop solutions that can eliminate those barriers. As of November 2004, the Office on Homelessness had developed a list of programs that local homeless coalitions need help accessing. These programs include the Department of Children and Families’ Emergency Financial Assistance for Housing Program, Public Housing Authorities' Section 8 Program, and Temporary Assistance for Needy Families. According to Office on Homelessness managers, workshops to address barriers posed by these programs will take place during the first quarter of 2005.

The council's strategic plan also notes that it is seeking to establish working agreements with agencies that administer mainstream programs to ensure there is a concerted effort to reduce barriers to homeless individuals. To date, it has fully executed an agreement with the Agency for Workforce Innovation and Workforce Florida to assist the homeless in achieving greater independence through employment. The council is in the process of finalizing agreements with the Department of Community Affairs and the Department of Corrections.

How can state agency practices be improved to better assist the homeless?

State agencies perform a variety of functions that benefit the homeless, including providing technical assistance and funding to local coalitions. (See Appendix C on page 14 for a description of services provided by state agencies to assist the homeless.)

Most (11 of 15) local coalition directors responding to an OPPAGA survey gave high ratings to the assistance provided by the state Office on Homelessness. However, coalition directors identified some state agency functions that could be improved to enhance services for the homeless, such as better discharge planning for homeless persons and streamlining certain administrative requirements.

Few state agencies have developed or implemented discharge planning policies. Discharge planning is important for people leaving state services who are at risk of becoming homeless. These persons include inmates exiting state correctional facilities, children aging out of foster care, families coming off public assistance, developmentally disabled individuals being de-institutionalized, and mentally ill persons leaving state institutions. Discharge planning refers to preparing a person in an institution for return to the community and linking these individuals to needed community support services.

Some local coalition directors expressed concern that state agencies were not adequately planning for the discharge of persons who could potentially become homeless. For example, the Department of Correction's current discharge planning efforts relies on showing inmates instructional videos prior to their release.

The state Council on Homelessness is working to address these concerns and identified discharge planning as a priority issue in its strategic plan. The council is working with state agencies to formulate program-level discharge planning agreements for various populations at risk of becoming homeless. These discharge plans are to address whether individuals will have housing, services such as transportation, medication, and clothing, personal identification and documentation, employment, benefits (TANF, Food Stamps, Medicaid), and a support network (family, friends) once they are released. The Department of Corrections is currently developing a discharge plan that it expects to finalize by the end of 2004. The Office on Homelessness expects the Department of Children and Families, which administers state public assistance, foster care, and mental health programs, and the Agency for Persons with Disabilities to start developing discharge plans in 2005.

Requirements of some assistance programs pose barriers to homeless applicants. Coalition directors identified several state administrative requirements that impede homeless persons in accessing assistance programs. They told us that the administrative requirements of programs such as Medicaid, Food Stamps, and Temporary Assistance for Needy Families (TANF) make it difficult for them to provide services to the homeless.

Specifically, coalition directors noted client identification and application requirements, and the eligibility determination process for these programs as barriers to assisting clients. Many programs require applicants to provide documents proving their identity, citizenship, income, and financial resources. However, homeless people often do not have these documents because they may not have a safe and secure place to store important papers. This may delay the processing and approval of their applications for services.

These barriers are consistent with those noted in a 2002 report by the U.S. Government Accountability Office (GAO). The GAO report noted that homelessness complicates the ability of people to access program services because paperwork requirements and the need to regularly communicate with agencies and service providers tend to be more difficult for individuals lacking a permanent address or phone number.⁷

How can local entities better coordinate services for the homeless?

Homeless coalitions depend on numerous local agencies to provide various services to homeless persons. Local service providers include shelters, food and clothing banks, and mental health and substance abuse treatment centers. Ideally, homeless individuals can access these services through a coordinated system of local service providers.

Most local service providers are trying to coordinate their activities. Our review of local continuum of care plans submitted to HUD in 2003 determined that most providers attended meetings held to coordinate delivery of homeless services. Over half of the local homeless coalition directors who responded to an OPPAGA survey reported that service providers participated in their local continuum of care.

However, efforts to further improve coordination are hindered by two factors:

- some homeless service providers are not participating in their local continuums of care; and
- most homeless coalitions have not yet fully implemented homeless management information systems.

Some homeless service providers do not participate in their local continuums of care. Six coalition directors responding to our survey reported that some providers of homeless services in their community were not participating in the local continuum of care, including some public housing authorities, public defenders, and state attorneys. They believed that these entities may not be participating because they do not have the time or the personnel to devote to the continuum’s activities or were not interested in being involved. Coalition directors noted that the limited involvement of these and other stakeholders makes it difficult to coordinate services, reduces their ability to acquire federal funding, and impedes efforts to share information about homeless individuals .

Most homeless coalitions have not yet fully implemented homeless management information systems. HUD requires communities that receive federal dedicated homeless funding to track information about their clients with a computerized information system. These information systems are expected to allow local providers to systematically share information, integrate services, and maximize the use of resources. Sharing client information also should reduce duplication in provider intake activities, facilitate referrals among providers, and improve the coordination of services.

Most homeless coalition directors responding to our survey reported their coalitions have not fully implemented homeless management information systems. For example, two coalition directors said their systems had not yet been developed. Other coalition directors told us that only a few of their local service providers were entering information into their systems.

Although the U.S. Congress initially intended homeless management information systems to be fully implemented by 2004, this goal has not been met. According to Office on Homelessness managers, HUD’s 2005 Notice of Funding Availability will encourage local continuums of care to speed up implementing their information systems. They said that participation in a system will be a factor in determining the amount of funding local continuums of care receive from HUD. HUD is also providing technical assistance to continuum of care agencies to assist them in implementing their homeless management information systems.

A problem that could limit the usefulness of the information systems is that some local providers do not wish to use the systems due to concerns with the confidentiality of client data. For example, one provider director told us he did not want to participate in the information system because he was concerned that law enforcement agencies would access the system and use it to locate and arrest homeless persons. Until such issues are resolved, it is likely that some local providers will not enter client data into local homeless information systems.

Conclusions and Recommendations

The economic impact of homelessness in Florida is significant. We identified $168 million in state, federal, and local funding for programs and services to assist the homeless, such as housing, food preparation and distribution, transportation and mental health counseling. However, this figure excludes additional expenses incurred by various local entities, such as the police, the courts, emergency service providers, and hospital emergency rooms, in dealing with homeless persons. These expenses cannot be precisely determined because they are not routinely tracked by homeless coalitions, service providers, and government agencies.

Florida is doing well on a statewide basis in obtaining dedicated federal funding for the homeless; however, some local homeless continuums of care have not been successful in accessing dedicated and mainstream federal funding for the homeless.

State agencies assist local homeless efforts by providing technical assistance, direct services, and funding. However, some state agency practices such as discharge planning could be improved, and some administrative requirements of programs such as Medicaid, food stamps, and TANF pose barriers to homeless persons seeking benefits.

Coordination among local homeless service providers is occurring, but could be improved by getting more entities to participate in local continuums of care and by local coalitions fully implementing their computerized information systems.

To improve the provision of services to homeless in Florida, we recommend that the State Office on Homelessness take the actions described below.

- Expand their assistance to local continuums of care experiencing difficulty receiving the pro-rata amount of dedicated federal funding for the homeless. The office should help these continuums develop plans and proposals that meet federal grant award criteria and priorities;
- Develop and disseminate guidelines for accessing and qualifying for mainstream program benefits. In addition, the Council on Homelessness also should continue its efforts to establish working agreements with mainstream program agencies to reduce barriers to access by homeless individuals.
- Revise the terms of its grants to require sub-grantees (local service providers) to participate in a homeless management information system. Such information systems are expected to benefit local providers by allowing them to systematically share information, integrate services, and maximize the use of resources.

In addition, we recommend that the Council on Homelessness work with state agencies to develop discharge plans to help prevent individuals transitioning out of institutions and other forms of state care from becoming homeless.

Agency Response

Mr. Gary VanLandingham
Interim Director
Office of Program Policy Analysis and Government Accountability
111 West Madison Street, Room 312
Tallahassee, Florida 32399-1475

Dear Mr. VanLandingham:

The department has reviewed the preliminary findings and conclusions in your report on the Economic Impact of Homelessness. The department concurs with the findings and conclusions, including the recommendations to improve services to the homeless by state and local entities.

The Office on Homelessness will continue to provide technical assistance to local continuums of care by encouraging them to apply for HUD funding and assisting them in meeting the necessary criteria for acquiring federal grant awards. Our office will also continue our efforts to help homeless individuals acquire assistance from mainstream programs. Workshops to address barriers posed by these programs will be held during the first quarter of 2005. We have made changes to our 2005 grant agreement to require sub-grantees to participate in a computerized information system to help maximize resources by integrating services and sharing information. Additionally, the Office of Homelessness will support the work of the Council on Homelessness as they develop discharge planning procedures within state agencies to reduce the risk of people leaving state services and facilities from becoming homeless.

The department wishes to express our appreciation to the research team for this report. The cooperative working relationship with our Office on Homelessness was appreciated, and allowed for continuous input to the report's findings.

Sincerely,
